

Barchester Towers

Excerpt: ...should now deny his love. He had, therefore, nothing for it but to go down on his knees distractedly against the sofa and swear that he did love her with a love passing the love of man. The signora received the assurance with very little palpitation or appearance of surprise. And now answer me another question, said she. When are you to be married to my dear friend Eleanor Bold? Poor Mr. Slope went round and round in mortal agony. In such a condition as his it was really very hard for him to know what answer to give. And yet no answer would be his surest condemnation. He might as well at once plead guilty to the charge brought against him. And why do you accuse me of such dissimulation? said he. Dissimulation! I said nothing of dissimulation. I made no charge against you, and make none. Pray don't defend yourself to me. You swear that you are devoted to my beauty, and yet you are on the eve of matrimony with another. I feel this to be rather a compliment. It is to Mrs. Bold that you must defend yourself. That you may find difficult; unless, indeed, you can keep her in the dark. You clergymen are cleverer than other men. Signora, I have told you that I loved you, and now you rail at me. Rail at you. God bless the man; what would he have? Come, answer me this at your leisure
