Not illustrated. 1869 edition. Excerpt: ...least among them, Dr. Tempest;--and to them I shall yield. You may tell the Bishop of Barchester that I shall at once resign the perpetual curacy of Hoggstock into the hands of the Dean of Barchester, by whom I was appointed. No, Mr. Crawley; I shall not do that. I cannot control you, but thinking you to be wrong, I shall not make that communication to the bishop. Then I shall do so myself. And your wife, Mr. Crawley, and your children? At that moment Mr. Crawley called to mind the advice of his friend Giles Hoggett: Its dogged as does it. He certainly wanted something very strong to sustain him in his difficulty. He found that this reference to his wife and children required him to be dogged in a very marked manner. I can only trust that the wind may be tempered to them, he said. They will, indeed, be shorn lambs. Dr. Tempest got up from his chair, and took a couple of turns about the room before he spoke again. Man, he said, addressing Mr. Crawley with all his energy, if you do this thing, you will then at least be very wicked. If the jury find a verdict in your favour you are safe, and the chances are that the verdict will be in your favour. I care nothing now for the verdict, said Mr. Crawley. And you will turn your wife into the poorhouse for an idea! Its dogged as does it, said Mr. Crawley to himself. I have thought of that, he said aloud. That my wife is dear to me, and that my children are dear, I will not deny. She was softly nurtured, Dr. Tempest, and came from a house in which want was never known. Since she has shared my board she has had some experience of that nature. That I should have brought her to all this is very terrible to me,--so terrible, that I often wonder how it is that I live. But, sir,...
