Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: ... Addison's own interest should be held inviolate. If any confirmation of facts like these, so honorable to both, and affording so complete a refutation of the calumnies heaped upon Swift, were wanting, it is to be found in Addison's own correspondence under his own hand. In a letter written a little previous to this period, which shows the delight he took in Swift's society, and does justice to those social qualities and high characteristics which made him so much courted by the ingenious and well-informed of all ranks--not excepting the highest--we trace in every line the regard in which this great man was held by his amiable contemporary.--I have run so much in debt with you that I do not know how to excuse myself, and therefore shall throw myself wholly upon your good-nature; and promise, if you will pardon what is past, to be more punctual with you for the future. I hope to have the happiness of waiting on you very suddenly at Dublin, and do not at all regret the leaving of England, while I am going to a place where I shall have the satisfaction and honor of Dr. Swift's conversation. I shall not trouble you with any occurrences here, because I hope to have the pleasure of talking over all affairs with you very suddenly. I hope to be at Holyhead by the 30th inst. Lady Wharton stays in England. I suppose you know that I obeyed all the bishop of Clogher's commands in relation to Mr. Smith; for I desired Mr. Dawson to acquaint you with it. I must beg my most humble duty to the bishop of Clogher. I heartily long to eat a dish of bacon and beans in the best company in the world. Mr. Steele and I often drink your health. I am forced to give myself the airs of a punctual correspondence with you in discourse with your friends at St. Jamess coffee-house, who are...
