Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XIX Philips Picnic ON Pattys return she found the veranda almost deserted. Christine and Mr. Hepworth, Elise and Mr. Van Reypen had gone down to the beach. Mr. Fairfield had gone to the city, and Nan was chatting with Kenneth. Ducky stepmother of mine, said Patty, as she wound her arm around Nans neck, if you dont want to monopolise this young man, Id like to borrow him for a short time. You may take him, Patty, said Nan, with a resigned sigh. But I suppose you know you will leave me alone in a cold world! Your father has gone to New York. But, Nan, you ought to have some time to yourself. Solitude is an awfully good thing once in a while. Dont you sort of feel the need of it now? Yes, I think I do, said Nan, laughing; so you may have Kenneth for a while. iWhat are you going to do with him? Take him for a spin, said Patty. Come on, Ken. Kenneth hesitated for a moment. Dont you want to go spinning with Patty, Mrs. Fairfield? he said. No, thank you; I have some household matters to attend to. One cant have a house party without occasionally having an eye on domestic affairs. So, good-bye. Be home in time for luncheon. Soon Patty and Kenneth were flying along the beach road, and the Swift Camilla was living up to her highest reputation. Patty was driving, and Kenneth was polite and amiable, but not merry. After a time, Patty slowed down speed a little. Kenneth, she said, abruptly, Ive something to say to you, and Im going to say it right straight out. You know what Elise told you that I said about you, or rather about the locket you gave me? Yes, I know; and, by the way, it seems that just about everybody else knows, too. Never mind that, said Patty, knowing that the boy was annoyed because Mona had interfered in the...
