

The Young Adventurer

I wish I could pay off the mortgage on my farm, said Mark Nelson soberly, taking his seat on the left of the fireplace, in the room where his wife and family were assembled. Have you paid the interest, Mark? asked his wife. Yes; I paid it this afternoon, and it has stripped me of money completely. I have less than five dollars in my pocketbook toward buying you and the children clothes for the winter. Never mind me, said his wife cheerfully. I am pretty well provided for. Why, mother, said Sarah, the oldest daughter, a girl of fourteen; you havent had a new dress for a year. I have enough to last me till spring, at any rate, said the mother. You never buy anything for yourself. I dont go in rags, do I? asked Mrs. Nelson, with a smile. Mrs. Nelson had a happy disposition, which led her to accept uncomplainingly, and even cheerfully, the sacrifices which, as the wife of a farmer in poor circumstances, she was compelled to make. You are right, Sarah, said Mark Nelson. Your mother never seems to think of herself. She might have been much better off if she had not married me. The children did not understand this allusion. They had never been told that their mother had received an offer from Squire Hudson, the wealthiest man in the village, but had chosen instead to marry Mark Nelson, whose only property was a small farm, mortgaged for half its value. Her rejected admirer took the refusal hard, for, as much as it was possible for him, he loved the prettiest girl in the village, as Mary Dale was generally regarded.
