

Hopes and fears: Or, Scenes from the life of a spinster

Excerpt from Hopes and Fears: Or Scenes From the Life of a Spinster Who ought to go then and who ought to stay! Where do you draw an obvious border line? Cecil and Mary. Among the numerous steeples counted from the waters of the Thames, in the heart of the City, and gruded by modern economy as cumberers of the soil of Mammon, may be remarked an abortive little dingy cupola, surmounting two large round eyes which have evidently stared over the adjacent roofs ever since the Fire that began at Pie-corner and ended in Pudding-lane. Strange that the like should have been esteemed the highest walk of architecture, and yet Honora Charlecote well remembered the days when St. Wulstans was her boast, so large, so clean, so light, so Grecian, so far surpassing damp old Hiltonbury Church. That was at an age when her enthusiasm found indiscriminate food in whatever had a hold upon her affections, the nearer her heart being of course the more admirable in itself, and it would be difficult to say which she loved the most ardently, her city home in Woolstone-lane, or Hiltonbury Holt, the old family seat, where her father was a welcome guest whenever his constitution required relaxation from the severe toils of a London rector. Woolstone-lane was a locality that sorely tried the coachmen of Mrs. Charlecotes West End connections, situate as it was on the very banks of the Thames, and containing little save offices and warehouses, in the midst of which stood Honoras home. It was not the rectory, but had been inherited from City relations, and it antedated the Fire, so that it was one of the most perfect remnants of the glories of the merchant princes of ancient London.
