Excerpt: ... CHAPTER IX YORICK AND ELIZA THE charge that his writings had done injury to the young was often repeated. It is a sad business altogether, and it must be said that there is something degrading to our literature, and almost unique, to find a writer, who has to earn his wage by pandering to the grosser tastes of his time. At the same time there are signs that, with the decay of his health, he was beginning to have uneasiness and compunctions as to his unworthy office. Unluckily, while making this plea for him, we find him engaged in one of his most sentimental amours, over which the sober must shake It is stranger to find in the sermon read by Trim a description of his own state,-- A man shall be vicious and utterly debauched in his principles, exceptionable in his conduct to the world, etc., etc. Surely you must think conscience must lead such a man a troubled life. Alas! conscience had something else to do all this time than break in upon him.... This dumb god was either talking or pursuing, or was in a journey, or peradventure he slept and could not be awoke. their heads and the judicious grieve. All the world knows Yoricks letters to Eliza, and the French, in particular, have taken a special interest in this episode, which is much in their line. It is a curious and not uninteresting episode, and I shall now give complete account of the transaction, the first that has yet been presented. In Bristol Cathedral is to be seen a graceful monument, consisting of two classical figures bending over a shield, one bearing a torch, the other a dove. This is a tribute to the memory of Mrs Elizabeth Draper, Yoricks Eliza, and Sternes friend, in whom, it records, genius and benevolence were united. She died Aug. 3d, 1778, aged 35. Yoricks letters...
