Not illustrated. 1894 edition. Excerpt: ... is the master of this establishment; his death will cause a vacancy; that vacancy must be filled up. Oh, Mrs. Corney, what a prospect this opens! What a opportunity for a joining of hearts and housekeepings! One more, pursued the beadle; compose your darling feelings for only one more. When is it to come olH Mrs. Corney twice essayed to speak; and twice failed. At length, summoning up courage, she threw her arms round Mr. Bumbles neck, and said, it might be as soon as ever he pleased, and that he was a irresistible duck. Matters being thus amicably and satisfactorily arranged, the contract was solemnly ratif,ed in another teacupful of the peppermint mixture; which was rendered the more necessary, by the flutter and agitation of the ladys spirits. While it was being disposed of, she acquainted Mr. Bumble with the old womans decease. Very good, said that gentleman, sipping his peppermint. I ll call at Sowerberrys as I go home, and tell him to send to-morrow morning. Was it that as frightened you, love? It wasnt anything particular, dear, said the lady evasively. It must have been something, love, urged Mr. Bumble. Wont you tell your own B.? Not now, rejoined the lady; one of these days. After we re married, dear. After were married! exclaimed Mr. Bumble. It was nt any impudence from any of them male paupers as-- No, no, love! interposed the lady hastily. If I thought it was, continued Mr. Bumble; if I thought as any one of em had dared to lift his vulgar eyes to that lovely countenance-- They wouldnt have dared to do it, love, responded the lady. They had better not! said Mr. Bumble, clenching his fist. Let me see any man, porochial, or extra-porochial, as would presume to do it; and I...
