Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: ... of year I should think the mountains would be very cold. The castle is comfortable. It has been recently fitted up, and there are many warm rooms in it. I am fond of the old place, and I need to be alone for a long time. Giovanni thought the conversation was becoming oppressive. He thought of what had passed between them at their last meeting in the conservatory of the Palazzo Frangipani. I shall myself pass the summer in Saracinesca, he said, suddenly. You know it is not very far. May I hope that I may sometimes be permitted to see you? Corona had certainly had no thought of seeing Giovanni when she had determined to go to Astrardente; she had not been there often, and had not realised that it was within reach of the Saracinesca estate. She started slightly. Is it so near? she asked. Half a days ride over the hills, replied Giovanni. I did not know. Of course, if you come, you will not be denied hospitality. But you would rather not see me? asked Saracinesca, in a tone of disappointment. He had hoped for something more encouraging. Corona answered courageously. I would rather not see you. Do not think me unkind, she added, her voice softening a little. Why need there be any explanations? Do not try to see me. I wish you well; I wish you more--all happiness--but do not try to see me. Giovanni's face grew grave and pale. He was disappointed, even humiliated; but something told him that it was not coldness which prompted her request. Your commands are my laws, he answered. I would rather that instead of regarding what I ask you as a command, you should feel that it ought to be the natural prompting of your own heart, replied Corona, somewhat coldly.
