Adams asked him what stuff that was He repeated? To which he answered, they were some lines he had gotten by heart out of a play-- Ay, there is nothing but heathenism to be learned from plays, replied he: I never heard of any plays fit for a Christian to read but Cato and the Conscious Lovers; and I must own, in the latter, there are some things almost solemn enough for a sermon. But we shall now leave them a little, and enquire after the subject of their conversation. CHAP. XII. More adventures, which we hope will as much please as surprise the reader. V NEITHER the facetious dialogue which passed between the poet and the player, nor the grave and truly solemn discourse of Mr Adams, will, we conceive, make the reader sufficiently amend his anxiety which he must have felt on the account of poor Fanny, whom we left in so deplorable a condition. We shall therefore now proceed to the relation of what had happened to that beautiful and innocent virgin, after she fell into the wicked hands
