As years increase, she brighter shines; Cadenus with each day declines; And he must fall a prey to time, While she continues in her prime. Cadenus, common forms apart, In evry scene had kept his heart; Had sighd and languislid, vovd and writ, For pastime, or to shew his wit. But time, and books, and state-affairs, Had spoiPd his fashionable airs: He now could praise, esteem, approve, But understood not whar was love. His conduct might have made him styPd A father, and the nymph his child. That innocent delight he took To fee the virgin mind her book, Was but the masters secret joy In school to hear th finest boy. Her knowledge with her fancy grew; She hourly pressd for something new; Ideas came into her mind So fast, his lessons laggd behind; She reasond without plodding long, Nor ever gave her judgement wrong. But now a sudden change was wrought; 56 She minds no longer what he taught. Cadenus was amazd to find Such marks o? a distracted mind: For, though she seemd to listen more To all he spoke, than eer before, 56 He found her thoughts would absent range, Yetguessd not whence could spring the change. And first he modestly conjectures His pupil might be tird with lectures; Which helpd to mortify his pride. 57 Yet gave him not the heart to chide; Vol. VII. N Bv. But in a miid dejected strain, At last he venturd to complain Said, slie sliould lie no longer teasd; Might have her freedom when she pleasd Was now convinccM, he acted wrong To hide her from the world so long, And in dull studies to engage One of her
