

Try and Trust; Or, Abner Holdens Bound Boy

Well, wife, said Mr. Benjamin Stanton, as he sat down to a late breakfast, I had a letter from Ohio yesterday. From Ohio? Who should write you from Ohio? Anyone I know? My sister, Margaret, you remember, moved out there with her husband ten years ago. Oh, its from her, is it? said Mrs. Stanton, indifferently. No, said her husband with momentary gravity. Its from a Dr. Kent, who attended her in her last illness. Margaret is dead! Dear me! returned Mrs. Stanton, uncomfortably; and I am just out of mourning for my aunt. Do you think it will be necessary for us to go into mourning for your sister? No, I think not, said her husband. Margaret has lived away from us so long, and people wont know that we have had a death in the family unless we mention it. Was that all the letter said about the death, I mean? Why, no, said Mr. Stanton, with a little frown. It seems Margaret left a child a boy of fourteen; and, as she left no property, the doctor suggests that I should send for the boy and assume the care of him. Upon my word! said Mrs. Stanton; you will find yourself in business if you undertake to provide for all the beggars brats that apply to you for assistance. You must remember that you are speaking of my sisters child, said Mr. Stanton, who, cold and selfish and worldly as he was, had some touch of decency about him, and did not relish the term beggars brats, as applied to one so nearly related to him.
