Not illustrated. 1893 Excerpt: ... lubberly done--muttered Cap, in a sort of soliloquy, not over-lubberly, though he should have put his helm a-starboard instead of a-port, for the vessel ought always to come-to with her head off-shore, whether she is a league from the land or only a cables length, since it has a careful look; and looks are something in this world. Jasper is a handy lad, suddenly observed Sergeant Dunham, at his brotherin-laws elbow; and we place great reliance on his skill in our expeditions. But come, one and all; we have but half an hour more of daylight to embark in, and the boats will be ready for us by the time we are ready for them. On this intimation the whole party separated, each to find those trifles which had not been shipped already. A few taps of the drum gave the necessary signal to the soldiers, and in a minute all were in motion. CHAPTER Xm. The goblin now the fool alarms, Hags meet to mumble oer their charms, The nightmare rides the dreaming ass, And fairies trip it on the grass.--Cotton. The embarkation of so small a party was a matter of no great delay and embarrassment. The whole force confided to the care of Sergeant Dunham consisted of but ten privates and two non-commissioned officers, though it was soon positively known that Mr. Muir was to accompany the expedition. The quartermaster, however, went as a volunteer, while some duty connected with his own department, as had been arranged between him and his commander, was the avowed object. To these must be added the Pathfinder and Cap, with Jasper and his subordinates, one of whom was a boy. The males of the entire party, consequently, consisted of less than twenty men, and a lad of fourteen. Mabel and the wife of a common soldier were the only ...
